Collaborative Documentation

APRIL 4, 2011 3.25 CEU’S

At Local Government Center, 1201 Court Street NE, Salem

Collaborative Documentation supports effective, person centered services and interventions. By collaborating with clients in developing clinical documentation, both the clinician and client have the opportunity to review and clarify important aspects of the clinical process. Clinicians often report that what they considered important during a session turns out to be quite different from what the client considered important. Field data from implementation projects indicates that more than 80% of clients find Collaborative Documentation helpful, while less than 3% report it was not helpful. Clinicians who adopt Collaborative Documentation report less stress and an improved quality of work (and home) life due to not needing to find time to catch up on back-logged documentation.
